M. Pharm. Dissertation Details:

Dissertation Title; Development of Antiacne Herbal Gel

Research Guide: Dr. Avinash V. Patil.

Acne vulgaris is a chronic inflammatory disorder of the pilosebaceous units, its prevalence is highest in adolescence, where the individual encounters several psychosocial changes. Acne vulgaris affects over 80% of teenagers persists beyond the age of 25 years in 3% of men and 12% of women.

Until now synthetic medicines or antibiotics were used to treat acne. Herbal medications are considered safer than allopathic medicines as these are associated with side effects such as Contact allergy, Local irritation, Scaling, Itching, Redness, Skin pilling etc. There are very few herbal anti acne creams and gels available in the market and those are very costly. Keeping this in mind our aim was

- To develop herbal anti acne gel
- To evaluate the physical characteristics of prepared formulations
- To study effect on human volunteers

As a research student, I was involved in following activities

- Preparation of material for the study (i.e. selection of crude drugs, polymers, authentication, drying and storage of plants.)
- Extraction of crude drugs by simple maceration process.
- Pharmacognostical study.
- Development of gel.

Co-Curricular Activities:

- Published research paper on “Development of Antiacne Herbal Gel” in International Journal of Novel Research and Development (IJNRD).
- Participated in a 2-day National Level MSBTE Approved e-Faculty Development Program (FDP) on “Implementing ER2020: Challenges and Opportunities”.
